

I was recently watching the last snowfall after we went on lockdown and it was so calming and perspective inducing. I just felt at peace with the world and whatever was unfolding. Somehow, most of us will go on and experience beauty again.

When you are too sad to leave your room, it's oddly comforting to know someone would at least be there with you—in my case a spider. Which, actually, was better than a human. It was the tiny comfort of window-watching, web-making and waking up to 8 friendly legs that gave me just enough spirit to feel cozy inside.

There have been times while I've been riding my bike on trails and come across deer that end up sort of racing along in the woods with me. It's always sort of an odd experience—I think we're both wondering what's happening.
